

Annual Report of the American Institute, on the Subject of Agriculture, 1850 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Annual Report of the American Institute, on the Subject of Agriculture, 1850

The Trustees of the American Institute of the city of New-York, herewith present to the New-York State Agricultural Society, a report of their proceedings for the past year, in conformity to the law passed May 5, 1841, which constituted the Institute, the Agricultural Society of the county of New-York. The Annual Transactions of the American Institute cover an extended field, in which our fellow citizens throughout the country, who are engaged in agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and the arts, to a greater or less extent, are interested. It seems, therefore, necessary to embody in this report, every thing of interest, coming within the purview of the Institute, for the general information of all who are engaged in those great pursuits. Agriculture and manufactures are the parents of commerce; the ingenuity of the mechanic is indispensable to them. How essentially necessary to agriculture is the labor which is applied in originating and perfecting labor-saving machines for its use; and in improving the numerous implements it has already received from the hands of the artizan. Any attempt to separate these interests, must be injurious, and should at once be discountenanced. Let the intercourse of classes, mutually dependant, be as free as air; the benefits resulting will be great, and as mutual as the intercourse is free.
