

The Disposal of Municipal Refuse (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Disposal of Municipal Refuse
The author was retained by Major John McGaw Woodbury, Commissioner of the Department of Street Cleaning of the City of New York, to make certain designs for the disposition of some of the city refuse. The matter contained in these pages is the result of the authors observations and records, and it is hoped that it will be so expressed as to be free of all bias and be of use to others. In no sense is Major Woodbury responsible for any of the statements made or conclusions drawn. The object of these pages is: First. To place the matter collected by the author, at considerable trouble and time, in a concise form, so that those undertaking to improve municipal conditions may more readily take up the subject and become acquainted with the principles involved. Second. To describe the characteristics of the different classes of refuse, and to draw attention to the fact that, if a uniform method of nomenclature and record of quantities handled could be kept by the various cities, then the data obtained and the information so gained would be a material advance toward the sanitary disposal of refuse. Such uniformity would not put any expense upon the cities, and direct comparisons and correct conclusions could be made for the benefit of others. About the Publisher
